What Is An Amicable Divorce?

Despite the “friendly” associations with the word “amicable,” in legal terms an amicable divorce has a specific meaning. In general, the term specifies that neither party is contesting any of the major issues that crop up when marriages end. These include crucial child-related issues such as custody, visitation and child-support. People who amicably divorce also agree on property division and spousal support.

An amicable divorce relies on both parties accepting that the marriage is ending. That's why another legal term, “uncontested divorce,” dovetails with “amicable divorce.” When couples decide to leave all matters of the divorce uncontested, it means that everything from filing the paperwork to finalizing the divorce is done at minimal expense — and more importantly, with the least possible emotional strain on the family.

Benefits of An Amicable Divorce

Deciding to go the uncontested route when legally ending your marriage has a number of benefits, not all of which are apparent until the final paper has been signed. Among the reasons couples choose to end their marriage amicably are:

- Rapid resolutions: An amicable divorce, no matter which path you take, is almost always resolved more quickly than a contested one.
- Less expensive process: Even if both parties feel the need to have separate attorneys rather than a mediation representative, an amicable divorce means that there are few, if any, negotiations for the lawyers to hash out. Attorney fees for basics like completing and filing paperwork in court is much less costly than taking affidavits and other tasks.
- Emotional well-being: Obviously, the more a divorcing couple can agree about, the less emotional baggage each spouse will have to cope with going forward. When children are involved, it's in their best interest to not only come to a custody agreement that puts the children first, but for them to know that they can count on both of you to co-parent on friendly and fair terms.
- No stressful court appearances: In amicable divorces, it's rare that the involved parties themselves have to appear in court. This prevents the couple from having to relive their turmoil in a public setting, and also lessens the chance of further conflict with the other party.

- More restricted information: With couples not having to make the kind of accusations against one another — either in court testimony or through filed statements — that are common in contested divorces, privacy is better safeguarded. Many more details that emerge from drawn-out, contested divorces are often on the public record.
