How an Attorney Can Help You Prepare for a Child Custody Evaluation

---

Although a child custody evaluation can be stressful, you don't have to go through it alone. A good evaluation incorporates multiple sources and methods for gathering information, including:

- Developmental histories.
- Personal interviews.
- Parent-child observation.
- Medical records.
- Psychological testing of both parents and children.
- Psychological, school and legal records.
- Documentation of home life, including photos, videos and sound recordings.
- Interviews with neighbors, teachers, babysitters, step-parents and others.

Although an evaluator likely will not place too much weight on any individual piece of information, you will spend significant time preparing the information requested. A knowledgeable attorney can assist you with getting physically prepared for the evaluation by gathering important documents like school and medical records, activity calendars, testimonial letters and others.

During your child custody evaluation, it's important to treat your evaluator with the utmost respect and approach the process like a job interview. Be friendly, smile and work to emphasize the positive. Your attorney will coach you not to view the psychologist as a confidante and to understand that any information provided is not private. Stick to the facts when commenting and allow the evaluator to reach her own conclusions.
